Core Persona: The Low-Obligation Casual Player

Context: Players usually play during short breaks or quiet evenings; available time varies and is not fixed.
Core Goal: To return to a familiar place, see a familiar character (the bird), and expect to see a small but understandable change.
Core Needs:
Clear travel state (knowing where the bird went and when it will return).
Easily discoverable rewards (knowing what was obtained).
Optional interactions (not wanting to be forced into actions).
Reliable persistence (game progress saved and not lost).
Internal Tension (To Be Tested): Players may enjoy the "daily routine" of checking in, but strongly dislike being punished for missing a day (e.g., losing streaks, losing rewards).
Potential Churn Point: If players keep repeating the same actions without feeling personal growth or meaning, they will get bored and quit.
Unknowns: Currently completely unknown: the exact segment size of this player group, age distribution, actual play frequency, willingness to pay, and retention rate.

Additional "Audience Boundary" Personas (Not Core Targets)

1. The Player Seeking Immediate Agency

Traits: Dislikes pure waiting, wants something to do immediately, and wants their choices to affect outcomes.
Recommendation: Can be used as a boundary test subject, but do not make the game too heavy just to cater to them, as this could ruin the experience for the core casual players.

2. The Genre Newcomer

Traits: Not very experienced with this type of game, needs very clear onboarding ("do one small action, see the feedback").
Recommendation: Need to evaluate whether to treat them as a primary audience or merely as a "newcomer onboarding test group."
